

The sketch on the right depicts the Pyrex measuring cup's standard, typical and expected environment: the kitchen cabinet. Each person's cabinet may differ in its layout, organization and contents, but the sole purpose mostly remains the same across the board. Cabinets are used for storage, regardless of what the items may be, so it makes sense that a measuring cup used in a kitchen would find its home within such a cabinet.

The sketch on the left depicts a public place, in this case just a generic park setting inspired by the Public Garden. The measuring cup's intrusion upon this setting would be jarringly unexpected, especially if it were to appear in the space on a scale much larger than the object's original size. In its new form and environment, the cup would be acting almost like a public sculpture or monument, much like the ones we see outside the MFA.
